About This Content

Back in 1947, Consolidated Vultee's beautiful jet bomber was dropped in favor of Boeing's superior B-47 Stratojet. Although it was lacking in several important areas, the XB-46 was very advanced for its time and was undoubtedly one of the most sleek-looking airframes ever to take to the air. An immaculately detailed virtual cockpit means that you can now experience this vintage bomber's aesthetics inside and out in FSX: Steam Edition

Features

- High quality interior (cockpit) and exterior models.
- Cockpit features authentic representations of both pilot and copilot stations.
- One bare-metal effect 4096-pixel livery.

A real fun plane to fly! The bomber viewport is real nice to look out of. Very nice virtual cockpit. OK. So I'll be a jerk here. What's the deal with Virtavia? Their US military aircraft are devoid of national insignia. I got no response from Virtavia, so I contacted DTG who were kind enough to reply. Their understanding is that Virtavia has some kind of licensing issue about US national insignia for the Steam editions of their products. That's got to be about the weirdest thing I've heard (no discredit to DTG, I trust their response). Just Flight, SWS, and other developers of military aircraft here seem to have no such licensing issues. Their models include all the correct insignia. The non-Steam editions of Virtavia's products also include all the correct insignia.

Does it affect the performance of the flight model? Certainly not. Does it affect the visual experience and immersion factor for the model? Yes. It just looks like it's missing stuff. And it just seems lame to me. To be clear, this is on Virtavia and not on DTG.

I've manually installed the non-Steam editions of my Virtavia products and I have no plans to purchase more Steam editions of their products. Just cheesy.
